Guards! Guards! (On Lulu's wedding night) His style is the same as that in Past Future: an unusual use of a common word, and in this case the word is "guard" rather than "guardian". It's not a great example, though it seems to be a deliberate linguistic dig at Robert Heinlein's style. To the left, at the bottom of the stair, I saw the silhouetted forms of two men I did not know. They were so shadowy as to be indistinguishable even by the camera's night vision, but I could make out their unsmiling, unconscious expressions. "Guards!" I whispered, grabbing the gun and holster from my bedside table. "Guards! Guards!" I said to the shadowy men in the stairwell. "What is it, friend?" said one. "What, old-timer?" said the other. "A man must guard himself from cold, wet, and loneliness." There's also a mildly humorous version of the common rhetorical trope: "Don't you dare knock on my door without me, now," I said. "Come on, let's go in my room." This is a bit longer than the previous one, and has a little extra from the narrator, making it into a satire of the common trope. "Keep your hands off my woman!" "That's right, she's mine!" he said. "I've come to take her home," I said. "I don't need your home, you big-bellied brute." He sat down on the bed and took out a gun. This is a parody of sorts, using the word "bully" instead of "guardian" and using "home" instead of "bedside". At the same time, the word choice here may be the original author's (James Morrow's) version of a common rhetorical trope, and he can't resist the temptation to make it into a parody. It's a fine, clear day, when I'm thoroughly fed up with the confounded affairs of men. I'm walking along a street, and a kid comes up and says, "Gee, Uncle Bob, how's the weather today?" It's the same style as the previous examples. It could almost be a parody. 82157476af
